“We cannot express care for the creation unless we first take care for the healing of our own bodies and souls. An environmentalism that is concerned only with the financial impact of environmental policies falls far short of the majesty of creation that we encounter in our liturgical and in our actual day-to-day existence. This applies even more directly on the local level: our diocese, our deanery, our parish, and the wider community. It is in our local community that we can have the most direct impact on the creation that we inhabit.”
